For the last six years, James Madison University has held an undergraduate research program for twenty-two underrepresented minority students who are primarily at an early stage in their academic careers. Each year we have made modifications to a program that has been based on using visualization and/or experiment to emphasize mathematical concepts. We will discuss the highlights of this six-year journey along with data collected and lessons learned. (Received September 25, 2012)