Previous research has shown that student attitudes are very important in student success (or lack of success) in college algebra. Using data-mining techniques we have developed Bayesian and hidden Markov Models of how student attitudes evolve during a college algebra course. The ultimate goal is to improve retention by delivering appropriate support to the right students at the right times. This approach should extend to other introductory/developmental courses. (Received September 25, 2012)