Statistics, Lively and Involved.

A statistics class became lively and involved when taught using the GAISE Report recommendations! Last fall, the presenter taught a seminar class in introductory statistics which used ideas from the GAISE Report. The class members chose to do a study of the school's orientation sessions, which involved creating the questions, helping administer them as a part of a larger study, analyzing the data and giving reports on it. In doing this study while studying the ideas of statistics, the students became excited and involved in the whole process. (Received September 27, 2005)
