We will discuss the use of the Classroom Salon “social reading platform” in the mathematics classroom (Calculus in particular). This innovative tool allows students to read and annotate the textbook on-line prior to class in a social context where they can view and respond to comments from the other members of the class. The instructor can view the annotations and use them to guide lecture/discussion in class. Experiences and observations from using this system to teach two sections of Calculus I during the Fall 2013 semester will be shared. (Received August 28, 2013)
