Incredible work is being done to help inspire young people to pursue mathematics, to convince them that they do not have to fit the stereotypes of mathematicians in order to join the community. But if we truly believe in creating an inclusive mathematics community, then we also need to figure out how to inspire the skeptics to see that diversity does not have to be a threat. I will talk about ideas and strategies for making progress in this direction. (Received September 24, 2018)
